1. The English language spoken in England is generally better than spoken in the United States.

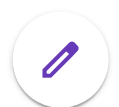

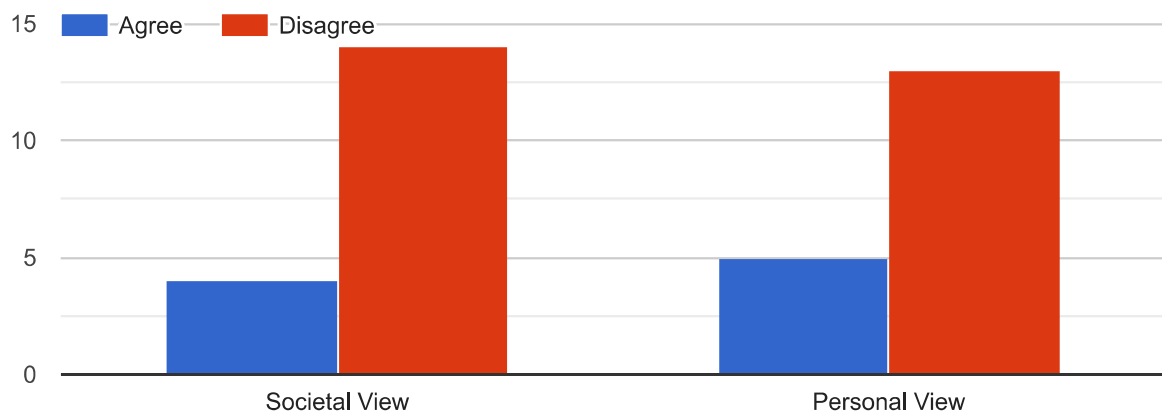

2. The written form of a language is a more faithful representation of the language than the spoken form

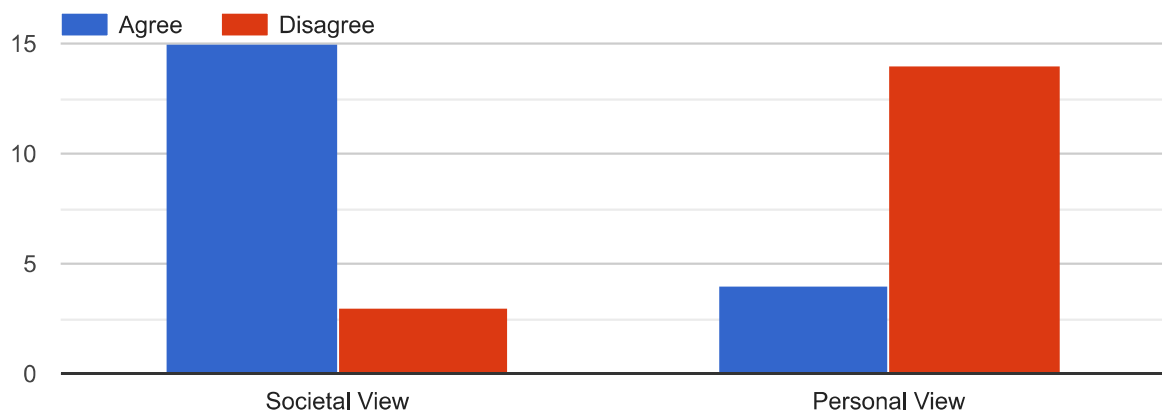

3. Knowing a language is—for all intent and purposes—entirely a matter of knowing words of the language.

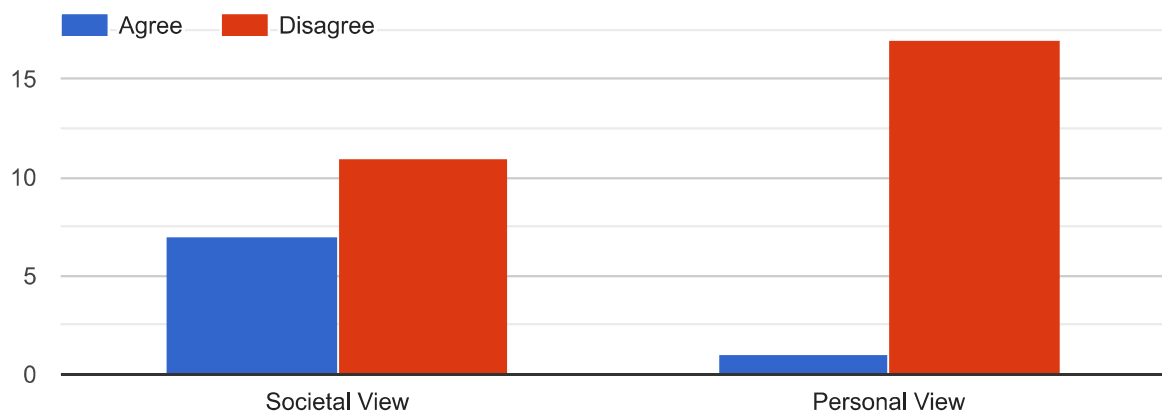

4. It takes so much time and conscious effort to learn the basic structure of one's native language that even adults often speak their native language incorrectly.

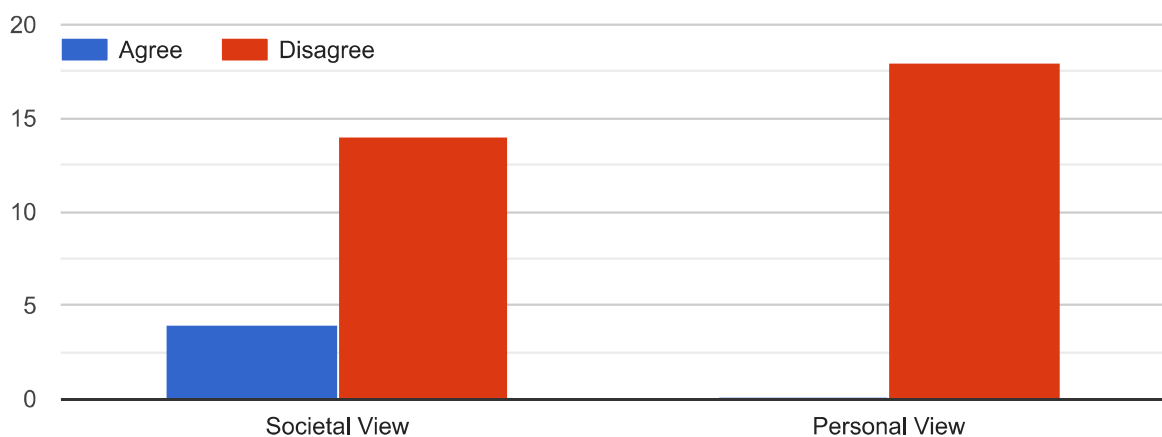

5. The kind of English used by radio and television newscasters is better than that used by most people.

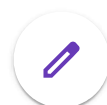

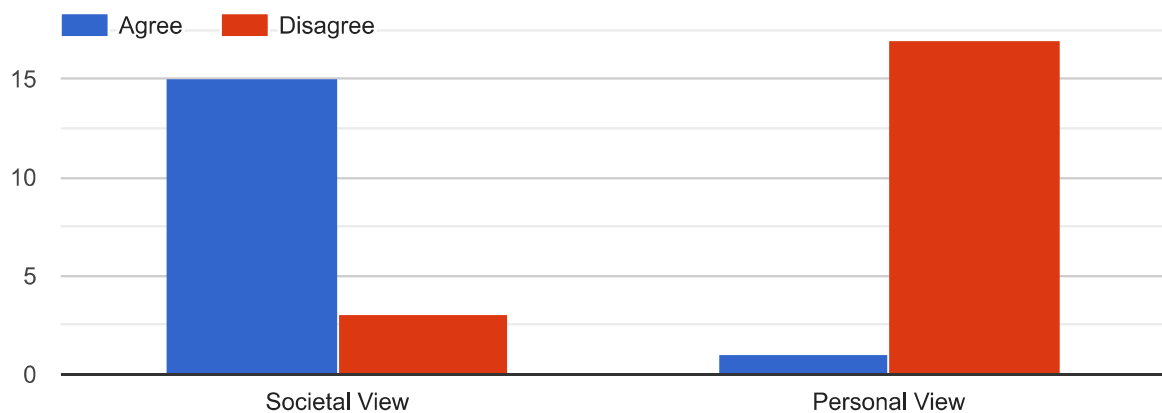

6. Once individual has mastered his/her language, (s)he uses the same speech pattern in all situations.

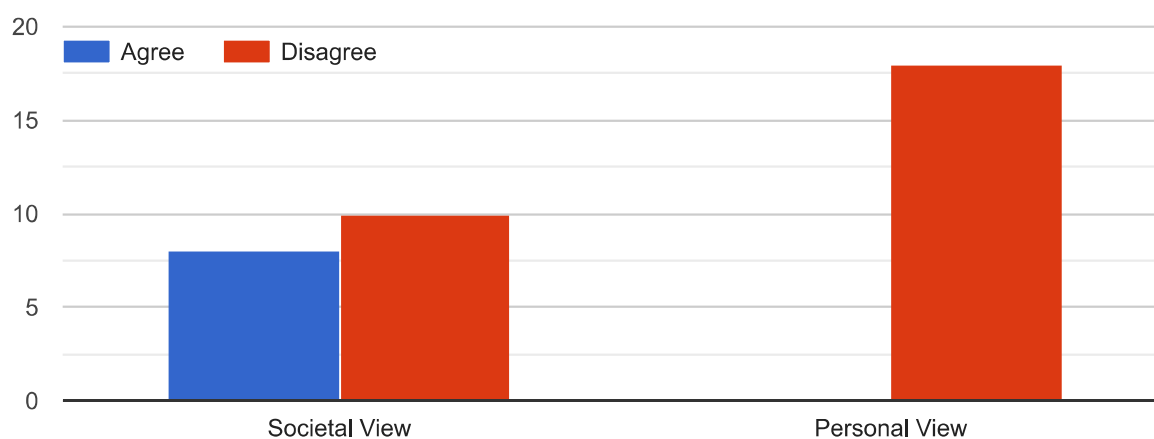

7. New usage in a language—such as hopefully in sentences like Hopefully, John will win the prize in English—corrupt the language and should never be used.

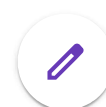

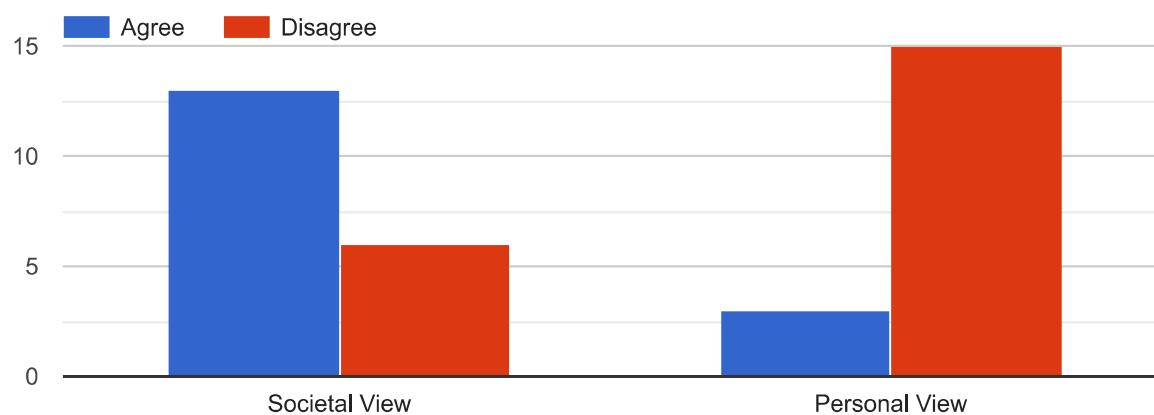

8. Some languages and/or dialects so primitive that they have few (if any) rules

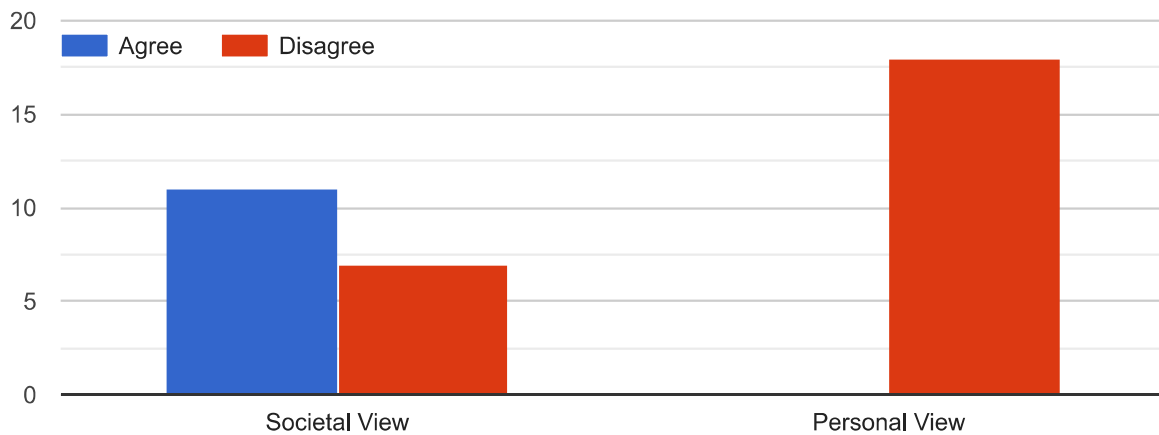

9. A developed and systematic language has no dialects of its own.

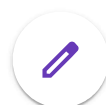

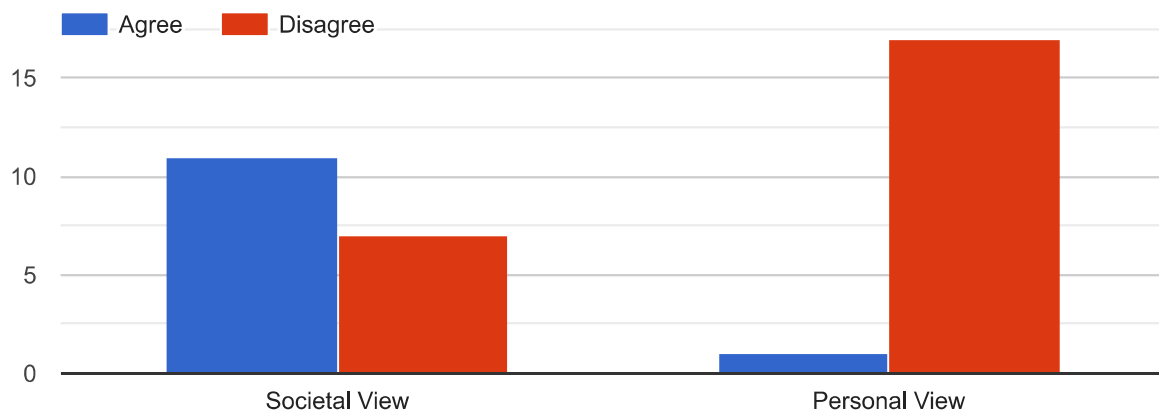

10. French is musical and is, thus, better than English.

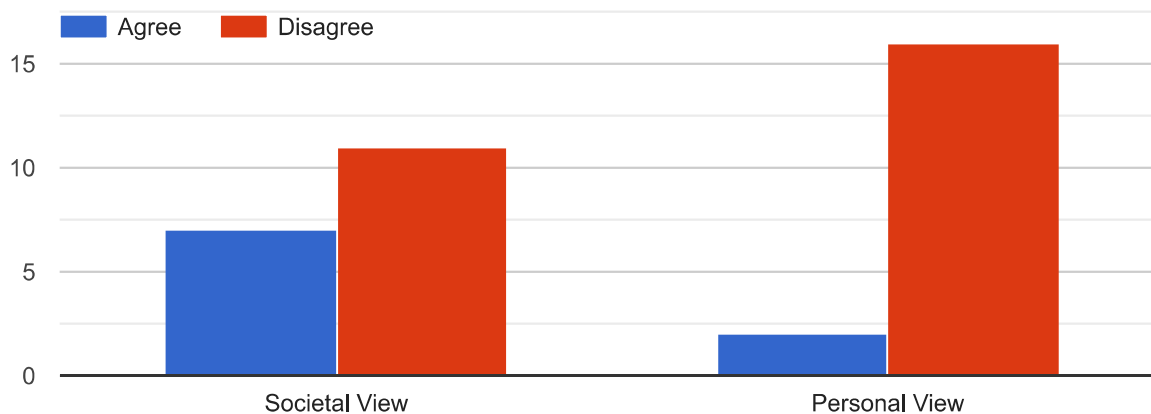

11. The languages of Europe are more developed than the languages of Asia and Africa combined.

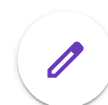

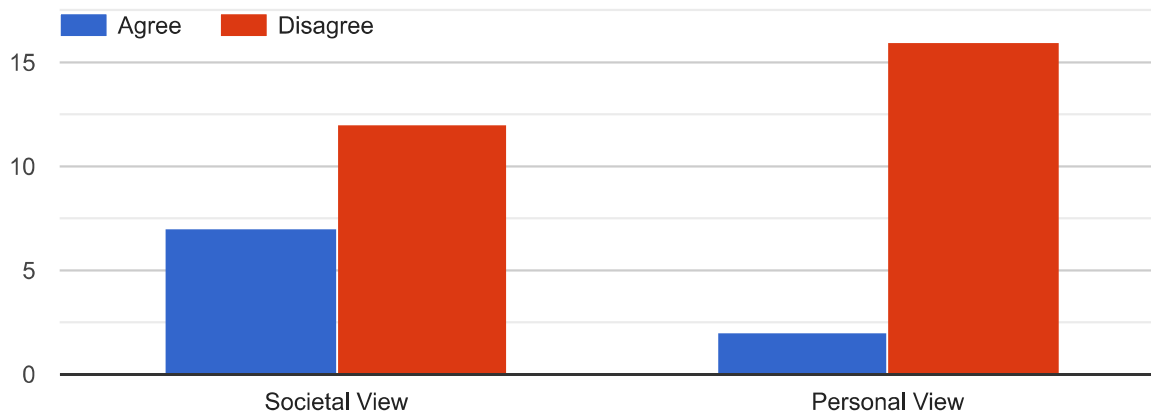

12. English is more logical and systematic than Chinese. The accuracy of this statement can be objectively tested by the fact English speakers have the ability (or tendency) to consult the dictionary of their language whereas Chinese speakers lack that ability (i.e. Chinese often do not consult dictionary).

13. Secret and simplified languages (e.g. universal languages such as Esperanto) languages are often free from linguistic rules.

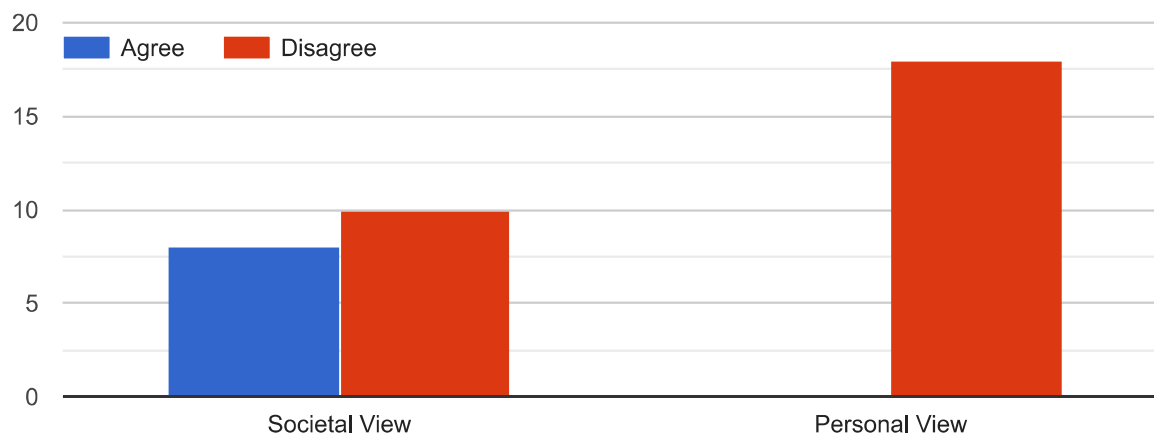

14. The Eskimo language has several different unrelated words for 'snow' but no general word for 'snow'. Therefore, native speakers of Eskimo are unable to think generally or abstractly.

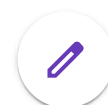

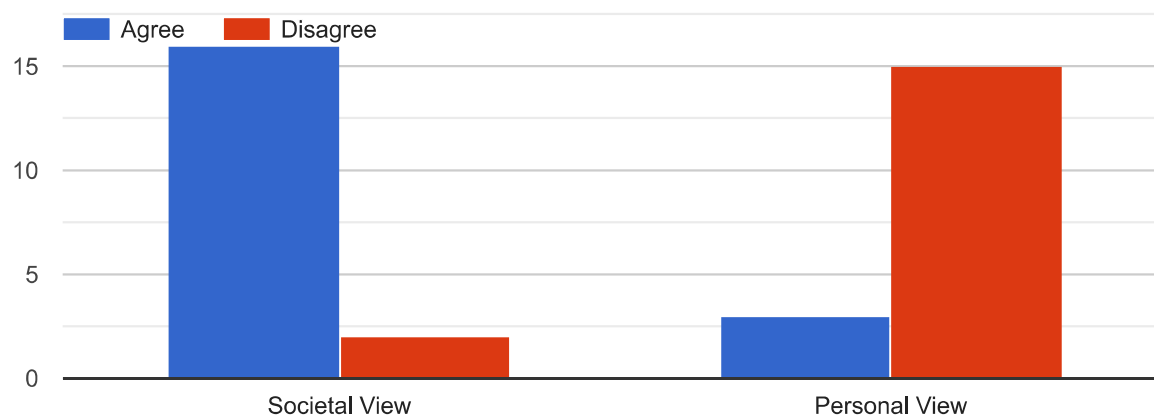

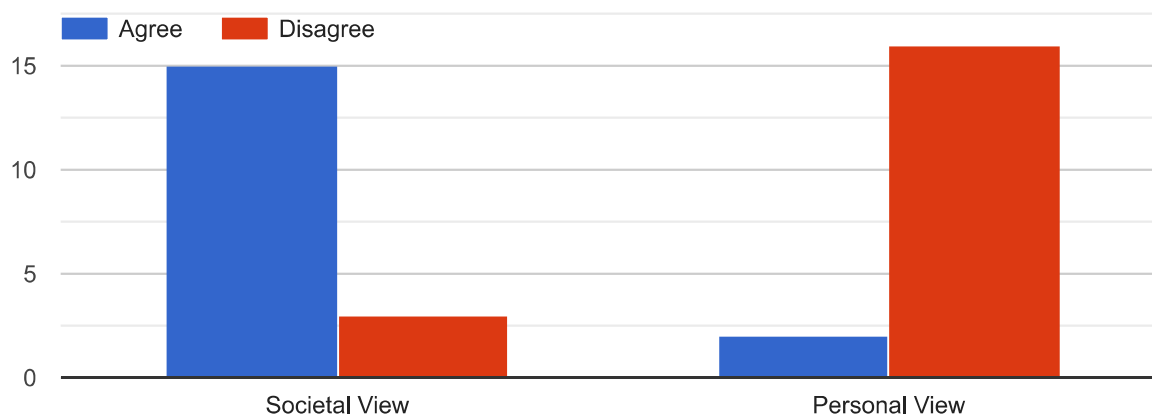

15. Educated speaker never make mistakes while speaking in their language.

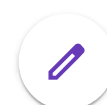

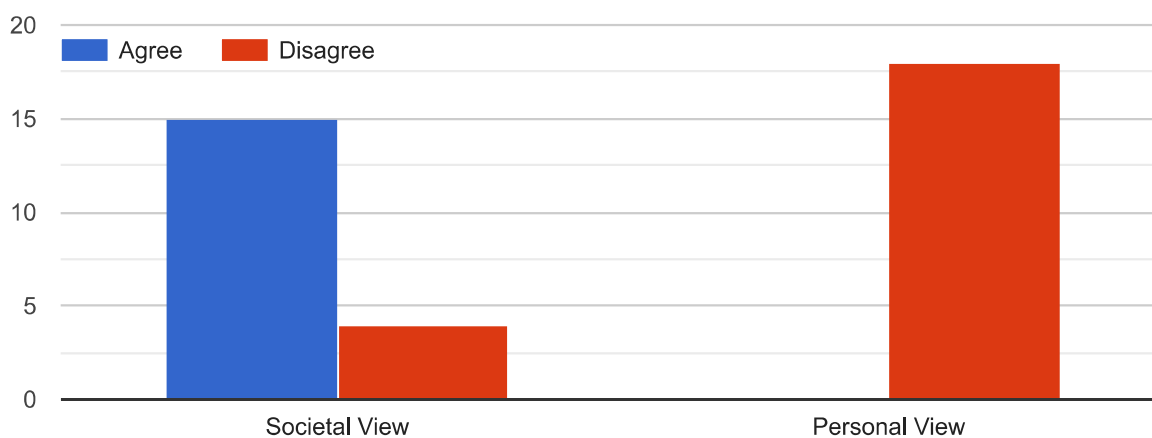

16. Linguists speak many languages.

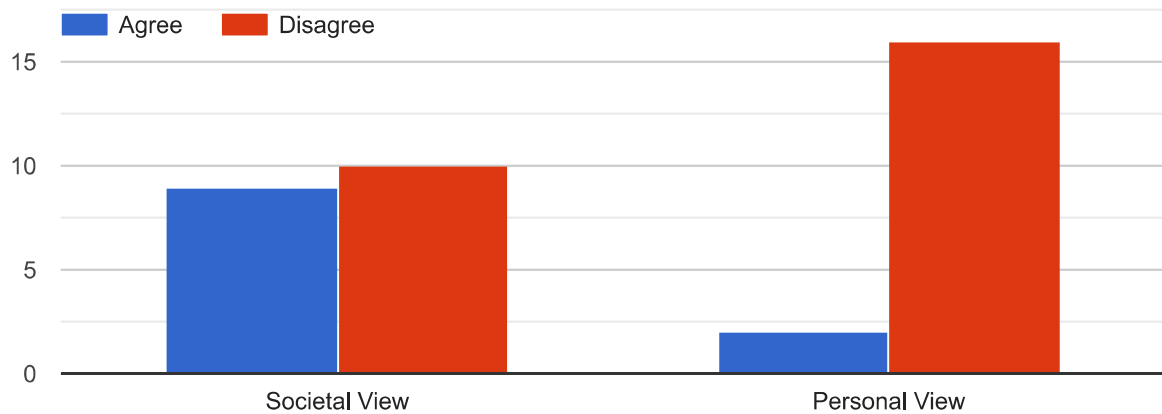

17. One language cannot be dialect at the same time.

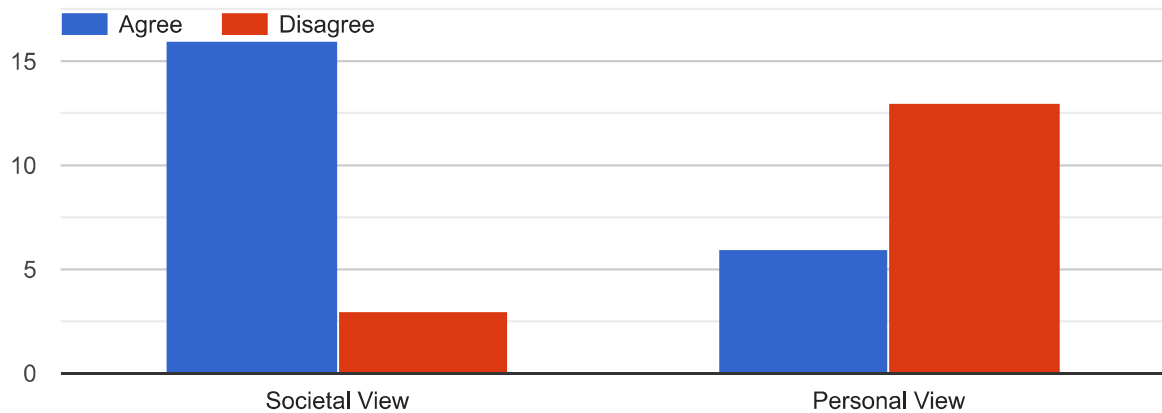

18. A dialect is a lower variety of its language.

19. A dialect becomes a language when that dialect develops a writing system of its own.

20. Children learn language by imitating or memorizing.
